Senator Hooser rose to speak on a point personal privilege and said:

"Mr. President, I rise on a point of personal privilege, if I could.

"Yes, we've been debating education for many, many weeks and months, if not years, in our community, and oftentimes we hear statements talking about how poorly Hawaii students do in national test scores. Statements to the effect that we're at the bottom of these test scores are repeated over and over in the media, and it give me great pleasure today to read some of the most recent test scores that were in the Honolulu Advertiser this morning, especially with the young people in the audience.

"In grade three reading and math . . . this is for the Stanford Achievement Test Scores, the most recent ones. In grade three reading and math, Hawaii public schools, 82 percent tested average or above average – 82 percent average or above average reading and math, grade three. In grade five, 80 percent in grade five scored average or above. In grade five reading and grade eight reading, about 75 percent in Hawaii public schools scored average or above. And in grade eight math, 73 percent of the students in Hawaii public schools scored average or above average.

"So, I think this shows that even though we all recognize the fact that we need to do much more, much better things for our students and our schools, that our students, as a whole, are competing above the national average, especially in the third, fifth, and eighth grade areas. So, I think they should be applauded for that.

"Thank you, Mr. President."
